

Why Your Gravel Driveway Keeps Failing

And the One Fix That Actually Makes It Last in Central Texas

You have thrown gravel at that driveway more than once.

It looked better for a few weeks. Then the ruts came back. Then another load of gravel. Same result.

Here is why -- and what actually fixes it.

The Real Problem Is Not the Gravel

Most gravel driveways in Central Texas fail for the same reason. They were never shaped right to begin with.

A driveway needs a crown -- meaning the center sits slightly higher than the edges. When water runs off the sides instead of down the middle, the gravel stays put. When it does not have that crown, water digs a channel right down the center and takes your gravel with it.

Throwing more gravel into a rut does not fix the shape. It just fills the hole until the next rain.

What a Bad Driveway Is Actually Costing You

- Vehicle wear -- every bounce through a rut is stress on your suspension, tires, and alignment.
- Gravel waste -- you buy load after load and it ends up in your grass or washed into the bar ditch.
- First impressions -- a washed-out driveway tells everyone who drives up that the property is not maintained.
- It gets worse every rain -- an uncrowned driveway is not a stable problem. It is a growing one.

What Actually Fixes It

Grade it first. Then gravel.

We cut down the high spots, fill the low spots, shape the crown, compact the base, deliver the right material, and spread it properly. Water sheds off the sides the way it is supposed to.

One job done right lasts years. One load of gravel dropped on a bad base lasts until the next storm.

What to Expect After

A surface that holds up in rain. Gravel that stays where you put it. A driveway that looks maintained and drives smooth.

Your truck rolls from the road to your house without you holding your breath.
